Recent Research Published in AAIDD Journals

Special Issue on Employment First: An Essential Strategy

The August issue of Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities is guest edited by William E. Kiernan (University of Massachusetts-Boston) and David Mank (Indiana University) and contains six articles and three perspectives on employment as not only a pathway to economic self-sufficiency but crucial to social relationships, community credibility, and meaningful activities. At the heart of this special issue are the presumptions that (a) all individuals can, or should, be provided with opportunities to work; (b) the policies, procedures, and practices (Employment First) place the focus on employment; (c) the desired outcome is competitive integrated employment; and (d) the goal is parity in the labor force participation rates for persons with and those without disabilities.” (full text of all articles available at no cost with member subscription to IDD)

Caregiver Report of Executive Functioning in a Population-Based Sample of Young Children With Down Syndrome

A study published in the July issue of American Journal on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities by researchers affiliated with the University of Colorado and Colorado State University describes the executive function of young children (<10 years) with Down syndrome. Executive function is the collection of skills, including working memory, planning, inhibition, and cognitive flexibility, which are necessary to solve novel problems and cope with changing task demands. Authors report finding a specific pattern of executive function weaknesses in their sample, specifically in the area of working memory.
